By Sarah Thompson Having a positive work experience can improve your chances of getting a job, even with few other factors influencing your job search. So it should be unsurprising that students who participate in an internship, or a similar unpaid work experience, are more likely to receive a job offer.

This effect is significant enough that experts can use it as a tool in calculating the cost-benefit of investing in unpaid work experience, says a study published in the Journal of Business Research. Looking for a job after graduation can be daunting, so it helps to have a realistic outlook, says PhD candidate Jennifer Chang in Melbourne's RMIT Business School. "You know that you're going to have to find a job, and you have to find a job that you're going to enjoy and that is going to fit with your values and your lifestyle," Chang says. A junior program manager at an IT services business in Melbourne, Chang spent three months interning at Enabio, a technology consulting company. "Through my internship, I had the chance to get practical experience, I had a level of independence, I had a level of responsibility and I was exposed to more business areas." The RMIT Business School study focused on all future graduates in Victoria, aged between 25 and 49. The sample size was "comprehensive" and the researchers controlled for a range of factors, including year of graduation. The study looked at perceptions of whether graduates have work experience, how valuable that work experience is and whether that job experience is a determining factor in the hiring process. The findings showed that graduates who engage in an internship are five times more likely to be offered a job. "The labour market doesn't stay the same," says Rhys Bowles from Sydney's Macquarie University. "You need to adapt to the changing labour market and the changing economy, and education has to be able to allow those changes." Which other factors contribute to a positive work experience? Arash Arauji from Monash University says there is a complex set of factors that affect a positive work experience. "It can be related to the workplace itself, but can also be related
