I've read plenty of posts here about special characters problems, but none of them solved my problem. Here is my html code: äääææ I save this link as a string, then I send it to my mail function (through ajax), however, when I read the mail, there are lots of strange characters. Is there any problem with the way I send/receive this string? A: You can simply remove the encoding: `var str="ääåææ"; str=str.replace(/\\/g,'_');` then send the mail. There will be no problem for webmail clients on windows. Q: Forcing the outgoing queue to be a subset of previous one I have an incoming queue which I'm pushing data into. I also have an outgoing queue which I need to provide data to. The outgoing queue should be a subset of the incoming. I need to make the outgoing queue an empty queue until the incoming is full. How can I implement this with multithreading? Is this the correct approach to this problem? A: Yes, that's a correct approach. The incoming queue is being supplied via multiple threads. Each time a thread is unable to push a message into the incoming queue (i.e. the incoming queue is full), the thread should block on the incoming queue until space is available. How do you do that? Multithreaded applications usually have lots of threads. There are lots of ways to implement concurrency in a multithreaded application. This particular use-case requires that you get rid of the empty queue by blocking each thread until it can write to the incoming queue. Of course, you
